At the beginning of the chapter, it was stated that "regrettable events of the last summer" had occurred. However, it is unclear what specific events are referred to as "regrettable events of the last summer". It could be a reference to the summer of 1875, when there were significant political and social disruptions in Romania. It is possible that the events referred to could include the Plevna Incident, which was a political crisis that occurred in the summer of 1875. This incident involved a conflict between the Romanian government and the Ottoman government over the autonomy of Romania. It is also possible that the events referred to could include the aftermath of the Congress of Berlin, which was a conference held in 1878 that resulted in the瓜 splitting of the Ottoman Empire and the granting of autonomy to Romania. It is not clear from the text what specific events are referred to as "regrettable events of the last summer". It is possible that the author is using this language to convey a sense of sadness or emotion about the situations that occurred. It is also possible that the author is using this language to convey a sense of hope or optimism about the future. It is not clear from the text what the specific events are that the author is referring to, but it is clear that they are of great importance to the author and that they are significant to the history of Romania.
